Overview

This bill gives Minnesota district courts original jurisdiction in actions involving public procurement whether or not the public body has arguably acted in a judicial or quasi-judicial capacity. In 2015, the Minnesota Supreme Court considered a claim by an unsuccessful bidder to provide transit service in Rochester. Among the claims considered was the bidder's assertion the city's denial of the bid-protest was biased. The court stated that, because the city's decision was "quasi-judicial" in nature, it could only be appealed through a writ of certiorari to the court of appeals and the district court lacked jurisdiction to consider it. See Rochester City Lines, Co. v. City of Rochester, 868 N.W.2d 655, 662–663 (Minn. 2015).

In general, a "quasi-judicial" decision is an act by a unit of government to decide a dispute over the rights of a narrow group of individuals. These types of decisions typically involve an investigation of the disputed claim and the weighing of evidentiary facts; the application of those facts to a prescribed standard; and a binding decision of the unit of government that resolves the dispute. In the case of the Rochester transit service, it was alleged that the city's action to reject a transit service provider's bid-protest constituted a quasi-judicial decision.

The bill also specifies that it does not change any standard of review or remedies, and it specifies timing requirements for filing the action.

Finally, the bill provides that the prohibition on awarding attorney fees in the Uniform Municipal Contracting Law (UMCL) applies to all actions arising out of procurement, even if not a "contract" under the UMCL.
